Comments:

I do not agree with creating an exception to the roadless rule to allow the perpetual degrading of the environment through coal mining. Especially with mountain top removal, coal has proven to be creating endless difficulties with clean up of their mining activities, including poisoning of water in surrounding areas. In this situation, they are in the process of destroying one more pristine wilderness. Our climate, among other things, relies on leaving the wilderness in tact. The numbers of droughts in the west recently can be substantially averted by leaving trees and the wilderness in a clean and carefully preserved situation.
