Stream buffers - long term concerns

As climate continues to warm, we are losing some tree species that are critical to shading and stabilization of streams which support aquatic species essential for the provision of trout ecotones.

The Forest Service should develop buffer maintenance options and revegetation plans that continue to support trout waters and their headwaters necessary to preserve, and if needed, restore our current trout environments.

Thank you for your consideration of this important forest service function. I'd appreciate an acknowledgement of this email so I know it has been properly delivered.
