

Date submitted (Alaskan Standard Time): 10/23/2019 12:00:00 AM

First name: Lorrie

Last name: Hall

Organization:

Title:

Comments:

Changes to the Roadless Rule really shouldn't make any difference regarding the Tongas National Forest.

Since the United States will soon be awash in oil because of the increase in the use of solar panels and the production of small electric cars, it makes no sense to destroy any wild place in the search for more oil.

The same would apply to the building of more oil wells off shore. If we had a president who understood that we needed to decrease the use of fossil fuels to inhibit the release of carbon dioxide, he would press the public to speed up the use of solar panels and the car companies to produce only electric cars.

It is clear that foreign car producers of small electric cars will eat our lunch unless we stop producing internal combustion engines and stop opening up more wild land for oil wells. The Tongas is the lungs of the Northwest.

[Position]

[Position]