Lifting the roadless rule of the National park wouldn't only destroy important parts of the forest with old-growth hemlock and cedar, but it would cause major effects on the wildlife. Both on land and in water living wildlife would have to move or wouldn't be able to live in their natural habitat.

The tourism which brings money in those regions without destroying big land miles and turning the forest into a wasteland would slowly die down, because it lost its uniqueness.

Don't open up the Roadless Rule on the Tongas Forest or any Forest there is.
