As a mountain biker I am glad that you are investing into the Aska trail system. It really needs it, but the problem that I have seen over the years is that places such as North Carolina, Colorado and California get the lions share of funds for new trail projects. The problem with that is they already have hundreds of trail systems each. Why is it places like Northeast Georgia don't get more mountain bike trails made? There is ample area for them in areas that have existing bike trails right now. Yet places that have an over abundance of trails keep getting the new ones. I say this because Northeast Georgia isn't the only kicked to the curb area it is just the one that I work on, ride on and enjoy having trails to ride that I don't have to drive hours away just to enjoy the sport of mountain biking.
